HISTORICAL ESSAY

How Madison Became a City

From Bear Hunting on the Capitol Square to a Fully-incorporated City

Although Madison was chosen as the state capital in 1836 and founded in the spring of 1837, it remained a small village for its first 20 years.

Bad Turn-out

In the spring election of 1839, only 54 people voted. A year later, the village contained only two stores, three public houses, three groceries, one steam mill for cutting lumber and a couple dozen houses — in all, 35 buildings surrounded by a thick forest. Wolves, bears, deer and game birds could all still be hunted on the capitol square, and during those years Dane County government effectively served the citizens' needs. At the end of 1845 a public meeting endorsed the idea of incorporating Madison as a village within Dane County, which the legislature approved on February 3, 1846.

Growing

Over the next decade Madison grew to such proportions that leaders pushed for its incorporation by the state as a city, with a municipal government. In his 1874 "History of Madison" Daniel Durrie tells what happened next:

"On the 2d of February, 1856, the board of trustees of the village appointed a committee consisting of A. A. Bird, Simeon Mills, Dr. Thos. O. Edwards, and J. P. Atwood to draw up a city charter, and to procure its passage before the legislature then in session. The bill was drawn and Madison became a "city" by an act approved March 4.

"On the 11th of March the first city election was held. Jairus C. Fairchild being an independent, and Julius P. Atwood the Democratic candidate for mayor; the former received 711 votes and the latter 506, electing Col. Fairchild by a majority of 205."

Fairchild

Jairus Cassius Fairchild was born in New York in 1801 and moved to Ohio in 1822, where for a time his business partner was the abolitionist John Brown. He came to Wisconsin with his family in June 1846 and two years later was elected state treasurer. He was the father of Civil War general and Wisconsin governor Lucius Fairchild.

Since the spring of 1856 Madison has been organized and governed as a city. Dozens of historical newspaper stories on Madison politics can be found on our website.

Cassius Fairchild, 1859

Portrait of Cassius Fairchild of Madison, the eldest son of Jairus Fairchild, about 1859. At this time he assumed responsibility for a large part of the family interests as well as achieving a leadership role in the Democratic Party. In 1959 he was chairman of the state party and elected to a position in the Assembly. He served during the Civil War and died prematurely as a result of a wound received at the Battle of Shiloh.

This was a simple auction, with four no trump being treated as Blackwood – even though there is a strong case for using it as natural after either Stayman or a minimum-level transfer bid; then the cheapest bid in the other major at the three or four-level is a general slam try in the major suit shown by opener.

West led the ten of clubs to dummy's ace and declarer made the obvious move of a heart to the queen. This brought mixed news; the finesse succeeded, but East still had a sure trump trick. At the table, declarer returned to dummy with a club and repeated the heart finesse. After cashing the ace of trumps, he took the simple line of cashing the king of diamonds and finessing dummy's jack. When this lost to East's queen, South bemoaned his luck.

However, dummy was not sympathetic. He pointed out that there was an additional chance. "Just cash your spade winners and then exit with the last trump. As East will only have diamonds left, he will have to lead one and you will make the three diamond tricks required for your contract"

"Of course, if it turned out that East had a safe exit available in one of the black suits," North continued "you would ruff in the dummy, cross to the king of diamonds and take the diamond finesse."

Once South opened with a strong, artificial two clubs, North always had a grand slam in mind. Rather than take up space by making a positive response, he decided to make a waiting bid of two diamonds. After the two heart rebid and raise, South declined to cue bid because he had a bare minimum for his opening.

North rolled out Roman Key-Card Blackwood and bid the grand slam in hearts once South showed four key-cards (three aces and the king of hearts). This was more than a tad agricultural as asking about the trump queen (with five spades) would see South bid six diamonds, showing both queen of hearts and the king of diamonds.

Still, the play's the thing. How should South plan to make thirteen tricks once West has led the jack of spades? Clearly the hand revolves around taking four diamond tricks. If diamonds are 3-2 or 5-0 or there is a singleton jack of diamonds all will easy. The difficulty comes when one defender has J-x-x-x. It seems that declarer will cash the ace of diamonds and then have to guess whether to play the king or the queen next.

However, declarer can reduce this risk of misguessing diamonds by gathering information about the defensive hands. He takes the spade lead with the king and draws trumps in three rounds. On this layout, after cashing the two remaining spade winners, followed by the minor suit aces and club ruff, declarer knows that West started with five spades, three hearts and at least two clubs – that's ten cards so he can't have four diamonds! Consequently, declarer plays the queen of diamonds next and makes his contract by finessing for East's jack.

South showed two of the five key cards (the ace and king of trumps plus the trump queen) after North's key card inquiry.

North's five no trump asked for side-suit kings and invited a grand slam. South, with a very suitable hand, was happy to accept.

West led the nine of hearts. Declarer counted the twelve obvious tricks and saw that normally the best chance of a thirteenth would be to play on clubs, which succeeds there is a singleton queen of clubs or when the clubs are no worse than 4-2, for then you can establish a long club by ruffing.

After winning the lead with the ace of hearts, declarer drew trumps and found East following twice. As East now has nine known cards in the majors, the combined chance of a 4-2 or 3-3 club break reduced to around 68% - down from the usual 84% or so.

Declarer realised that, as East had only four cards in the minors, aiming for a minor-suit squeeze on West was a better plan. Declarer cashed the minor suit aces and, when both opponents followed with small cards, he continued with the king of diamonds and ruffed a diamond. This left West in sole control of both minors, so when the remaining trumps were run, West has to abandon his guard in one of the minor suits.

Overall, the squeeze has nearly an 80% chance of success, much better than relying on establishing the clubs.

After North opened the bidding, South was hardly likely to stop short of game. His two heart cue bid promised a strong hand and asked North to find a bid that best described his hand. Once North chose two spades it was obvious to continue to game in that suit. How should declarer plan to make ten tricks when West leads a heart to East's ten and a trump is returned?

South had nine sure tricks and needed a tenth from somewhere. There was no point in trying for a heart ruff; if he played a heart, East would take this with the king and return another trump, leaving South a trick short of his contact (if a round of diamonds is conceded at some stage, to set up the suit, the defenders will be able to cash a third heart trick).

There is only one way to make the contract, by ducking a diamond at trick three, before the second round of trumps is drawn. Now declarer loses a diamond trick at a convenient time, while there is still a trump in dummy to deal with a third round of hearts. The defenders can do no better than cash one more heart and play a second trump. South wins in hand, draws trumps and discards his remaining heart on a long diamond.
